A History of Smuggling in Ogdensburg

By James E. Reagen

It's been said that one of the previous owners of this property made enough money to start his legitimate business by running liquor across the border during Prohibition. I don't know if that story is true, but it's no secret that smuggling has been associated with Ogdensburg for over 200 years.

The Maple City has enjoyed a colorful reputation as a haven for smugglers since its first American settlers arrived here in 1796, shortly after the British were forced to evacuate Fort Oswegatchie and renounce all claims to Northern New York with the adoption of the Jay Treaty.

In 1807, when the U.S. Congress banned trade with England, Ogdensburg's founding fathers ignored the new law since the community's entire economy was based on trading across the river with their British Canadian neighbors.

An angry U.S. President Thomas Jefferson retaliated by sending troops here to stop the smuggling, enforce the Embargo Act and to prevent trade with British Canada. Shortly after the troops left, David Parish, one of the wealthiest men in America, built a large stone store at the meeting place of the Oswegatchie River and the St. Lawrence River. When it opened in 1809, it was the largest store on the St. Lawrence River in Northern New York. With only a few hundred people living on the American frontier, most of Parish's customers were the British Canadians living on the northern side of the river.

In 1812 when war broke out, American troops were dispatched to Ogdensburg where they again discovered that its leading citizens were not only ignoring the trade embargo with Britain, but that British officers were being invited over for tea at Parish's Mansion (now known as the Remington Museum).

In January, 1813, St. Lawrence County Court Judge Nathan Ford convicted Customs officers of assault for interfering with local smugglers. He wanted to send a strong message to federal authorities to leave local enterprising businessmen alone. General Zebulon Pike responded by helping Customs officials arrest nine smugglers, Judge Ford retaliated again by issuing warrants, arresting and jailing two U.S. Army officers for trespass, assault and false imprisonment of the smugglers. Ogdensburg later named Ford Street and Ford Avenue in his honor.

When the British invaded across the ice in February, 1813, Parish's store and his house were among the few that were not ransacked by British troops.

After the battle, Parish brokered a deal that kept US troops out of Ogdensburg for the rest of the war, allowing him to reopen his store so he could continue smuggling goods back and forth across the border. Ironically, years later U.S. Customs bought the store built by Ogdensburg's most famous smuggler, and today the Robert C. McEwen Customs Building houses the U.S. Border Patrol.

In 1919 when Congress banned the manufacture or sale of beer and liquor, Ogdensburg's traditional role as a home to smugglers resumed. Known as "Little Chicago" for its speak easies, brothels and trade in illicit alcohol, many city residents made their fortune smuggling beer and liquor from Canada through Ogdensburg.

The late Mark Coakley once recalled that smugglers during Prohibition would sit in their boat out at Ogdensburg's sandbar and wait for the lights to go out at the Customs station. When the officers would leave for the night, they would unload their shipment of booze in a bread truck that would wait for the Border Patrol to leave before it would pull up to the shore to pick up a shipment.

The late Ray Kentner of Waddington once told a reporter that a wagon that travelled from farm to farm on the Ogdensburg to Waddington road during prohibition actually carried a supply of liquor underneath a fake floor.

The Blue Church cemetery in Maitland, Ont., just a few miles west of Ogdensburg, reportedly has hollow grave stones where bottles of liquor were hidden. American bootleggers would land at the shore, sneak into the graveyard and unscrew metal plates covering the hidden compartments in the headstones.

The Greater Ogdensburg Chamber of Commerce advises scuba divers to be on the lookout for sunken cars and trucks littering the bottom of the St. Lawrence River that fell through the ice when smugglers drove them from Canada to the U.S., carrying loads of illicit booze.

Bootleggers would sometimes fill wooden crates with bottles of liquor, salt and a flotation device. If federal agents looked like they were going to intercept their boat, they would throw the crate overboard and it would quickly sink to the bottom because of weight of the salt. The federal agents would search the smugglers boat and find nothing while the water would dissolve the salt. When the crate bobbed back to the surface, the rum runner would be waiting to retrieve his illicit contraband. Today, scuba divers still find bottles of Canadian liquor and beer littering the bottom of the St. Lawrence River.

By the 1940s and 1950s, the rumrunners were gone, but Ogdensburg's reputation as the "sin city" of Northern New York was still intact. With more bars than churches and most of them lining the waterfront, Canadians from across Ontario would use the ferry to travel here and party on weekends. Many of the bars, stores and civic clubs operated illegal slot machines and other kinds of gambling.
